ISRAELI ELECTION STUDY, 1984 (ICPSR 2997)

SUMMARY: This election study was carried out in one panel during July 8-12, 1984, days before the elections for the Knesset. The study investigates attitudes toward the upcoming election, the current state of Israeli affairs, the question of territorial concessions for Judea, Samaria, and the Gaza Strip, and the presence of ethnic discrimination in Israel. Respondents were asked which political party they believed was best suited to address the challenges of the economy, defense, foreign affairs, and the democratic state. Their views were also sought on which political party--Alignment or Likud--was characterized by experienced leaders, represented minorities, represented the Jewish population, would stand firm in peace negotiations, knew how to withdraw from Lebanon while maintaining the Northern border, would reduce the ethnic gap, and would maintain a democratic regime. In addition, respondents were asked which political party they blamed for the problems of violence, emigration from Israel, high inflation, corruption, crime, and the ethnic gap. Background information on respondents includes age, gender, education, religion, voter participation history, ethnicity, political party membership, political orientation, social class, place of birth, father's place of birth, employment status, monthly expenditures, number of rooms in the home, and number of people living in the home.

UNIVERSE: Adult Jewish population in Israel, not including residents of kibbutzim and settlers in the occupied territories.

SAMPLING: Representative sample of the population of Israel in 1984.

Elections Study 1984

The Israel Elections Study of 1984 was based on a representative sample of the adult, Jewish population. It was held between 8-12 July 1984 and included 1259 respondents.

The findings are organized according to the structure of the questionnaire. The questionnaire presents questions and possible answers -- the number that appears to the left of each question indicates the punch card position. The numbers to the right of the answers indicate the percentage distribution of each question. The percentage of interviewees that did not respond is indicated below the distribution according to the answers for each question.

The field research was conducted by "Dahaf". The questionnaire was composed by Prof. Asher Arian from the Political Science Department, Tel Aviv University. These data are presented and made available as part of the activities of the Romulo Betancourt Chair of Political Science of Tel Aviv University.

Think about the ideal party you would like to see in government and rate it on these scales. For example, if your ideal party should be young, give it 1, and if it should be old, give it 7; if it should be young, but not entirely so, give it 2 or 3, and if it should be old, but not entirely so, give it 5 or 6; if it should be neither young nor old, give it 4.
